cries of joy: "Abantu abengi baisa, bayaula kapundu, balakakasha, balasempula abati: mulenaisha, mulenaisha, muletemesha." If there is no success, silence reigns in the house. At dawn the nasenge (paternal aunt) comes to pick up the unhappy wife and takes her home. This means that the marriage is broken. The crowds who have gathered to celebrate disperse again. (Cases of impotent husbands are rather rare. On the other hand I have heard of cases where the husband was rendered impotent by drugs /miti/ which had been mixed in his food. I know of a verified case right here at Malolé.) 565 833 757

Kuoa (the bath). Once the sexual act has been accomplished, the two spouses get up and at dawn they go to the river. The husband places himself upstream, the wife downstream, as they wash. After the bath they both return to their hut. They find that the hearth fire has been thrown out and that the center of the hut has been whitewashed. They will remain seated without fire. 515 585

Lunweno (small vessel). The nasenge comes up holding a small earthenware lunweno in her hand. She lights a new fire near the foot of the bed /nyambalimo/, where she places three small ant nests /tumafwasa/ to hold up the small vessel. Together the three of them (aunt, husband and wife) pick up the small vessel full of water, holding it by the rim with two fingers, and place it on the fire. They wait until the water starts to boil. The aunt /nasenge/ then draws a little water by means of a very small ladle and pours some of it over the hands of both husband and wife. 585

Kabwali (a small meal). Then the aunt, who has previously brought along some flour, prepared a small meal for the two. When the bwali is cooked, she takes a mouthful /lutoshi/ or a pellet and tosses one into the mouth of each. The spouses then may finish the bwali by themselves. Meanwhile the little vessel remains on the fire until the fire goes out. Before taking it off /ipula/, a present must be found for the aunt who has lent the vessel. The couple give her a chirundu, or mat. Then she takes back her vessel, replacing it by another, called the kanongo.

Kanongo or Kapalwilo. The aunt brings this new little vessel saying "Eko muleumina ko," i.e., when the couple must /220/ have sexual intercourse, they take bow, arrows and hatchet out of the hut. Together they put water into the little vessel and repeat the preceding ceremony. 585 834
